

Planets D6 / Conheav Sector - Cholddut

Cholddut System

System Datafile:

System: Cholddut

Star: Chold (yellow)

Orbital Bodies:

Name	Type	Moons
Cholddut	terrestrial	3

Capsule: The Cholddut system is unusual in that it only has one planet, and that planet happens to be habitable. The space in the system tends to be fairly busy, as it is an important stop on the way out of the sector.

Cholddut

Type: terrestrial

Temperature: temperate

Atmosphere: Type I

Hydrosphere: moist

Gravity: standard

Terrain: islands

Length of day: 19 standard hours

Length of year: 276 local days

Sapient species: Humans, Redsha (N)

Starport: stellar class

Population: 3 million (Humans), 286 million (Redsha)

Planet function: trade, homeworld, research

Government: Imperial governor and elected council

Tech level: space

Major exports: any

Major Imports: any

Capsule: Cholddut is the first stop after the Lechar system within the Conheav sector, and therefore sees a lot of trade which spills over from the bustling Lechar. Cholddut is a lush, but violent world. The flora on the planet tends to be small, rarely are trees more than 3 or 4 meters in height. This is because the planet has a more pronounced axial tilt than is common in inhabitable worlds. This causes extreme seasons, which causes severe weather patterns, which are further enhanced by the tidal forces created by the planets 3 moons. Added to this is the fact that Cholddut is composed virtually entirely of large islands rather than continents. This means that everywhere on the planet is vulnerable to ocean storms. At any given point on Cholddut it is a rare month indeed when there are fewer than 2 major storms. Because of these conditions the only plants which survive are those that will bend with the wind rather than break or be uprooted. Likewise the only animals which survive are those with high birthrates, and those which are able to adapt quickly.

Cholddut is also the home to the Redsha, who had reached a feudal level of civilization when they were first contacted by the Old Republic. The Redsha are the most common species on the planet, but they adopted human culture wholesale, with very few exceptions. This is a result of the natural tendency of the Redsha to adapt to virtually anything extremely quickly. The Redsha operate most of the businesses on the planet, simply by virtue of greatly outnumbering humans. Redsha are notorious for always looking for short term profits rather than planning for the long term. This affects those dealing with them in that Redsha businessmen tend to always push for a hard deal with no concern about whether they are likely to receive any return business. Because of this Cholddut has a reputation as being the place where the most cut-throat trading in the sector goes on, despite the fact that Lechar, and not Cholddut, is the biggest trading center in the sector. Anyone who can build a fortune trading on Cholddut is considered to be someone to be respected and feared in the business community.

Cholddut is also known as a home of all sorts of different research facilities. It is surmised that this is because the Redsha are so open to change. Regardless, some of the most important corporations in the sector have research facilities here, researching everything from weapons (Lobic Arms maintains an underwater facility on the planet where they research aquatic weapons), to medicines (BreendaTech, a local drug manufacturer is based on Cholddut), to cybernetics (MerenData maintains a research facility here). Many places throughout the galaxy which are devoted to research are also considered to be great centers of learning, but Cholddut is considered to be a place of innovation rather than knowledge.

Cholddut is ruled by an Imperial governor in combination with an elected council. The council generally has a very hard time agreeing on anything, except in times of crisis. During a crisis the council, which is usually made up mostly of Redsha, acts with amazing speed and decisiveness. It could be said that the way the government actually works is the opposite of most Imperial worlds. The Imperial bureaucracy handles the day-to-day operations, while the elected council takes control during emergencies. The Imperial governor isn't terribly happy with this arrangement, but he tolerates it largely because it works so well. It should be noted that this arrangement is purely unofficial, officially the Imperial governor and the council have equal power at all times, but this is simply the best way that the government works.
