DESCRIPTION:

Where standard model Vigilante light capital ships were general combat vessels able to fill multiple roles in the field, the Pantak-class was a more specialized variant equipped with a heavy immobilizer pulse weapon. It is intended to excel in capture and retrieval missions, and excel it does.

Having replaced its railgun with the immobilizer, much of the ship's compliment and layout are different from the standard Vigilante model. It carries less Prowlers and Marauders, has less cargo space, less cpassenger and troop space, and room has been made for the extra crew needed to operate the immobilizer weapon. With these changes, the Pantak-class' ability is far from diminished. Unlike standard Vigilantes that may have to engage many enemy targets at once on the battlefield, the Pantak-class' mission profile usually has it focusing on a single, lone target. For this purpose, its light compliment of Prowlers and Marauders work to its advantage.

A well known tactic for Pantaks is to use its prowlers to disorient the enemy as it approaches and lines up a shot with its immobilizer pulse weapon. After this, the target is usually incapacitated and incapable of fleeing or defending itself. The Pantak's crew then board the target vessel and take all necessary precautions to ensure the target stays in their capture.

Pantaks can be used against many targets, including normal ships, leviathans, or even strongholds that are considered not important enough for the attentions of a full on Command Carrier. Leviathans specifically are hunted by Peacekeeper Pantak-class vessels and their retrieval squads whenever one is sighted, and all Leviathans captured by these units have restraining collars placed on them to ensure they stay under peacekeeper authority.

A Pantak-class Vigilante leading one of these retrieval squadrons, led by officer Xhalax Sun, was sent in pursuit of the hybrid Leviathan gunship Talyn, ex-Peacekeeper Captain Bialar Craise and their comrades, tracking them for several months through space to different locations (Farscape season 3).
