Capsule: With remarkable foresight the FNA naval planners designed a starfighter carrier which would serve primarily in a maintenance and repair role, in order to take the burden off of vessels which were expected to be in frequent combat, and to complete repairs that were beyond the capabilities of regular fleet carriers. The Unicorn was the result of this planning, and in her first assignment, servicing escort carriers for convoys, she performed admirably, greatly cutting down on the number of starfighters lost due to equipment failures. Unfortunately the Unicorn was not to continue in the role for which she was designed, as a shortage of carriers caused her to take up duties as an operational carrier. In this the Unicorn performed adequately, but as she had not been designed specifically for such a task she has not shown exceptional performance by any means. Plans continue to call for the Unicorn to be used primarily as a maintenance carrier again, but a perennial shortage of carriers continues to force the vessel to be pressed into front-line service
