Description: The Bivall were a semi-aquatic sentient species of tall bipeds with lanky bodies, large eyes mounted on stalks, crested heads, and long fingers that were native to Protobranch. Sionver Boll and Okalin were members of this species.

Biology and appearance
The Bivall were a sentient species of tall instantly recognizable bipeds with lanky bodies, large eyes mounted on stalks, crested heads, and long fingers that were native to Protobranch, a planet located in the Core Worlds. Their scaly skin ranged in color from white and red to green. The species' lives revolved around water, but they did not need it to thrive and could settle far from it.

Society and culture
The Bivall were renowned for their high intelligence, leading to them being spread across the galaxy in various scientific positions. The Bivall homeworld of Protobranch was an agriworld and a major producer of bacta.

History
By the time of the High Republic Era the Bivall had integrated with the rest of the Galaxy. During the late Republic Era, a solar storm occured on Protobranch, causing the floating cities of the planet to fall to the surface.

Bivall in the Galaxy

Because of their high intelligence, Bivall could be found in various positions such as physicians, political advisors, researchers, and scientists.

During the High Republic Era, Scover Byne, a Bivall female was the owner of the Byne Guild, which was later dissolved when Byne was arrested. Quin was a Bivall slicer who was a member of the Nihil.

Sionver Boll was a Bivall scientist who worked for the Galactic Republic during the Clone Wars. She was later tasked by Chancellor Palpatine to study the Zillo Beast on Coruscant.

Okalin was a male Bivall who served the reigning king of Onderon as an advisor during the Clone Wars.
