Typical MetaCorp Soldier

MetaCorp Soldiers are usually positioned where ever extra fire power and more security is needed. They often work side by side with MetaCorp security forces and Stormtroops.

The MetaCorp Soldier is an intimidating sight to behold. The uniform of a typical grunt is all out geared for combat. The soldier wears a black body glove underneath a 2 piece combat suit which consists of military camoflaue green pants and jacket. Reflective blast plates are secured to the uniform by a strong velcro material. There are 15 plates in all and are located about the body, but they leave all joints exposed. Over the chest and stomach plates, two long straps that are connect to the waist belt in the front go around the shoulders, interlocking in an X pattern at the chest and head under the back armor plate where they connect again to the waist belt but in the back this time. These double straps have many metal rings and clips to hook extra equipment and packs to them. On the left side of the waist is a large satchel which may be used to collect extra or personal items and on the right side is a holstered blaster pistol (commonly the LP-41). On both exposed shoulders are two metal rank plates and upon the soldier's head is a rounded blast helmet which is the same color as the rest of the uniform. Connected to the helmet is the built in comlink. The comlink's microphone connects to small encased section on the helmet which is approximately around the soldier's ear area. this encasing also has the mircochips and electronics needed to power the targeting visor and recieve the soldier's LR-44 targeting information. The helmet also contains the soldier's squad markings which is painted onto the round encased piece.
