Description: Brasso was a human male who served as a Grappler and Honor guard on the planet Ferrix within the Free Trade Sector, which he had long been a citizen of. He was a close friend of Cassian Andor, willing to rescue his friend from the pitfalls of his regrettable misadventures and dubious arrangements, caring for his mother and her droid during his extended absences.

Biography

Regrettable misadventures

Brasso was a human male that resided on the planet Ferrix during the reign of the Galactic Empire. He served as a Grappler, tearing apart obsolete starships in the local salvage yard. In 5 BBY, his close friend Cassian Andor had been gone from Ferrix for some time, having left on a borrowed starship. His mother Maarva believed him to be out ruining his health and reputation with friends of low character, leading to Brasso to go looking for him.

Later that morning, Andor had returned from an encounter with Pre-Mor officers on Morlana One, which had resulted in a double murder, though Brasso was not aware of it. Meeting Brasso outside his workplace, a visibly-injured Andor asked Brasso to lie about where he was the night before. Creating a cover story, Andor said that they had wanted to go out drinking, but after Andor declined Brasso's suggestion to go to Cavo's, they drank nog at Brasso's home before falling asleep. Rather than question it, Brasso instead went on to embellish it further, creating a story of how they had hurt themselves when drunk at his home, a cover for Andor's injuries. He left for work soon after.

Sound of a reckoning

When a squad of Pre-Mor Enforcement officers arrived to arrest Andor for the two murders he had committed, Brasso wasted no time. With their Mobile Tac-Pod left unguarded, Brasso sabotaged the transport, securing it to a large piece of debris with a metal chain. When the officers engaged with Andor and Luthen Rael, who Andor had contacted to sell a stolen Imperial N-S9 Starpath Unit, one Corpo, designation North-3, attempted to get the transport airborne, Brasso's sabotage caused the subsequent crash of the ship and the death of the officer, when the attached debris got caught in a nearby structure. With blood on his hands and Andor having fled with Rael, Brasso returned to the local bar, downing a glass of alcohol.

Matters of grave importance

With Andor gone, Brasso and their mutual friend Bix Caleen were left to care for Andor's aging mother. Ferrix, now under Imperial occupation, was not the place it once was, Brasso and the Ferrix locals remained wary of the stormtroopers and Imperial officers that held the town. Caleen was later detained and imprisoned by Imperial agents at Hotel Rix. On her deathbed, Maarva recorded the speech to be played at her funeral and told Brasso the message that was to be passed to her son upon his return.

Soon after, Maarva passed, with Brasso going on to assist the Daughters of Ferrix in their duties, asking that B2EMO attend the coming funeral. The droid, left devastated by the loss of its owner and without company, was comforted by Brasso who stayed the night at the Andor household to comfort the lonely droid.

Fighting back

Upon Andor's return, Pegla arranged for him to meet with Brasso in an underground tunnel. There he relayed him Maarva's message, warning him not to pursue Bix and her captors and rather to take care of himself, but was ultimately unsuccessful in convincing him.

Brasso later led the funeral procession as part of the Ferrix honor guard, carrying the funerary stone containing Maarva's remains down Rix Road. He was moved by Maarva's funeral speech, coming to realize the true evil of the Empire that had occupied his home. With the patience of the Imperials running thin, Imperial officer Vanis Tigo attempted to stop the speech and attacked B2EMO, who was broadcasting the speech using a holoprojector. This was not received well by Brasso and the gathered locals, who began to fight back.

Immediately a riot erupted, with Brasso and many others lashing out, attacking the Tigo and his escort and moving on the barricade erected by the garrison. With the situation quickly escalating, Wilmon Paak, whose father Salman had been arrested by the Empire, threw an improvised explosive at the Imperial lines, leading to a chain of explosions that left many dead, transforming the riot into a bloodbath. As stormtroopers began to fire indiscriminately into the crowd, Brasso rushed to the aid of Paak, rescuing him from the clutches of Imperial forces. He later fled offworld aboard a Breon Dayvan with Wilmon, B2EMO, Caleen, who had been rescued by Andor, who himself had returned for Maarva's funeral, as well as Jezzi.

Hidden life on Mina-Rau

After Ferrix, Brasso joined Paak and Caleen in working as mechanics on the planet Mina-Rau. B2EMO and Andor also stayed with the group, who were on the agricultural world illegally without proper visas. During their time there, Brasso met the human Talia and began a romantic relationship with her. In 4 BBY, Andor would later leave the planet on an infiltration mission in service of a rebel network, leaving Brasso on Mina-Rau with the rest of the group. Brasso comforted the deeply-traumatized Bix with her frequent nightmares, as she often awoke in the night to the alarm of the others.

The Empire arrived at Mina-Rau soon after and began checking the visas of its citizens; the first inspection in ten years. The group's local friend Kellen met with them and revealed that a group of about forty Imperial troopers had finished inspecting the nearby Council Five Hundred. He informed Brasso and the others to be careful and not reveal their Ferrix origins. A small Imperial convoy later arrived at Kellen's shop for an inspection, forcing Brasso to lay low and avoid them. He interrupted a tense moment between Lieutenant Krole and Caleen, as the officer had been harassing her, prompting Krole to leave.

During a meal with other Mina-Rau farmers, Kellen arrived and informed Brasso that they were next on the inspection schedule; the Imperial troops would arrive the following morning. Kellen could only get him an Emergency Work Order for the Eight Hundred Block, where they could repair several sweepers and then circle back in a few days in order to avoid the Imperials. Kellen warned him to only use the order if they were stopped. The man added that somebody needed to pass word to Andor and tell him about the injustices that were happening. Brasso reassured him that the same things were happening everywhere and told Kellen to keep his head down; the two friends hugged goodbye and departed.

Arrest by the Empire and death

At their housing unit, Brasso shared an emotional goodbye with B-2EMO and left him in Talia's care, but the moment was interrupted by a TIE Reaper arriving carrying the inspection team. Brasso met Caleen and decided they must leave now, but they found Paak and his speeder missing. Taking off on his own speeder in search of the boy, Brasso returned to Kellen's shop and attempted to sneak around the newly arrived Imperials, but a stormtrooper caught him and took him prisoner. Sergeant Stang interrogated Brasso, but he instead removed any suspicion of Kellen by acting as if Kellen had betrayed him, protecting him from being detained. Stang quickly took off with most of the squadron and left Brasso under guard with the others, but they were soon engaged by Andor, who had returned in a a stolen experimental TIE Avenger.

Andor destroyed Stang's group with a torpedo and distracted the troopers left behind. Seizing his chance, Brasso sprinted away as the stormtroopers fired at him and gave chase. He reached his speeder and began to escape, but one stormtrooper lined up his shot and hit Brasso in the back, killing him and causing his speeder to crash. Andor landed the Avenger nearby and found Brasso's body; tearfully clutching it and begging for his friend's survival. He reluctantly abandoned Brasso's body in the fields as he escaped Mina-Rau with Caleen and Paak, all of them deeply saddened by the death of their close friend.

Personality and traits

Brasso was a burly, hard working human male with greying hair, green eyes and brown skin. He was a close friend of Cassian Andor and his adoptive family including Maarva Andor and her droid Bee, whom he had a particularly close relationship with. While he protested his friend's shady dealings and regrettable misadventures, he was still willing to assist his friend and lie on his behalf.
