

Droids D6 / Mark-8 Destroyer Droid

Mark-8 Destroyer Droid

Elvar Neral in his address to the RanCorp Research and Development commission on behalf of Alpha Wing design team was quoted as saying "On your own you can reach amazing heights but think of how high you can go if you stand on the shoulders of others."

And with that began Alpha Wing's research project. They went through old records looking for design concepts which could be modernized and revitalized. Such designs as the Naboo series war droids and mark-8 destroyers came from this.

The mark-8 rolls up into a rolling ball for main movement. It unfolds into a one meter tall biped form. In each arm there are two blaster rifles. They are designed in such a way that one fires then the next and so on and by the time the first fires again it's already finished its recycle period and can fire again, this allows rapid near unlimited fire. The weapons are powered by the droid's advanced powerplant and have nearly unlimited ammo. When in a fight they project an energy shield of great strength. Because of the design of the shield and the power drain the droids cannot move with the shield up. Still with their shields raised and their blasters firing nearly non-stop these droids can devastate groups of enemies. They can even be deployed right into a battle to decimate armies.

Game Notes:

Attack: They curl up into a ball and roll for primary movement, when attacking they unfold into a biped form with two blasters on each arm.

Shields: These shields add to the resist instead of armor while up. they act just like armor but shut off when the droid is at least lightly damaged then armor is the only bonus the droid gets. The energy shield resists physical and energy attacks equally.
